We have earned, from many years acquaintance with those who use i1, that they are commonly intelligent people, quite above the average indeed; that they have good reasons for their belief in its value and wholesomeness, while they leave to those who have never tried it all the horrors of its scratchiness, and the fears of being dissected alive by its blades of bran. It is gratifying to observe in the interests of public health, that its use is increasing very rapidly. A dozen years ago, one had to inquire where it could be found; now it is kept in almost every grocery and flour store. Formerly it was often compounded of brin, corn meal, rye, shorts, and various other articles; now it must be ground directly from the whole wheat, and a very clean and superior article at that. We believe the grain is generally much more thoroughly cleaned than that used for fine flour, because none of the tell-tale debris can be removed after grinding, therefore it must be removed before grinding.

We are now taking another step, in learning that it is generally improved by a special mode of grinding. It requires sharp stones, which cut the bran into fine pieces. The coarse, or "high ground" Graham, makes hard and rough bread biscuit. That which is rubbed fine by dull stones, while it makes the starchy part very fine and floury, leaves the rich crust of the kernel in coarse, unsightly flakes, and the flour is so much less rich and sweet. Some people make the mistake of sifting this bran out. It is much better to get that which is properly ground. If the stones are very sharp, as they should be, they cut the bran fine, and mingle thoroughly the starch and the gluten, giving you the entire richness and nutrition of the grain. It requires a little practice to distinguish such flour readily by the eye; but when once its BATTER BISCUIT.-A hot oven is indispensable. Place cold soft water in a stirring bowl, the colder the better. Stir with a spoon in one kand and sift in the floor with the other. Make just thick enough not to settle flat. Different kinds of flour require different proportions, but a good way is which is best. Bake either in tin or iron, very slightly oiled to prevent sticking. If in iron gem pans they should be heated first and the batter dropped in when they are hissing hot. Put them in the oven at once. Bake them on the top first, unless your oven is one of that rare sort that bakes evenly on all sides. They should begin to brown on the top in about fifteen minutes; then they may be set down to hake on the bottom. Twenty-five or thirty minutes should bake them sufficiently.
